THE SUPPLY TRAIN

Builders, architects, and designers share what they want from new products, sales pitches, and manufacturer relationships

By Mike Beirne, Senior Editor

ew products must offer a benefit to the homebuyer; that's the price of entry. If those products also can deliver better quality while costing less, then builders may be inclined to try them. But among the barriers to adoption is fear that the product won't perform, resulting in spending more money on callbacks or, even worse, defending against a lawsuit.

Builders prefer products with a track record, as expressed in one Arizona custom home builder's mantra, "Be not the first or the last (to try something new)." They want more education, whether it's easy-to-understand product literature, how-to videos, or reps who can guide builders through installation.

The holy grail is a personal relationship. "I want to know that there is someone who can help me solve any problem," an Arizona architect wrote. "Too often we find that products can be purchased for less (cost), but when there is an issue, it is difficult to find a solution from a call center." More findings about what builders, architects, and designers want from new products and manufacturers follow:
